You want it to be a big success, which means the first hurdle you face is getting people to show up. It's a busy time of year, and your office Christmas party faces great competition from other events-ones that may be considered more desirable than your invitation. Employees who are tired, stressed, and more than ready for a workplace break can find it hard to lure them into spending even more time with each other, especially if the annual company Christmas party has become a tired tradition. Having biscuits and drinks in the office while sitting around a flashing Christmas tree just isn't very pleasant. How can you have the kind of Christmas party society that people want to come and even look forward to next year? Whatever ideas you choose for the Christmas party, if you want it to be a success, do not keep it in the office. You can have your party provided by a celebrity chef or let a world-famous artist play and sing, but you'll never have fun, you can't miss this event next year if you keep it where the staff work. Being in a place where it usually does will make the temptation to talk about work too irresistible even when Yo-Yo Ma is playing. Although we tend to think of parties as evening affairs, they don't have to be. Even if your company's Christmas party idea is to host food for your guests in a restaurant or hotel, there's no reason why it can't be brunch or lunch instead of dinner. Or even afternoon tea. There are benefits to sticking with the day. First, people will drink less at lunch than at dinner. Just switching time of day can make alcohol less of a problem and help ensure that your party doesn't turn into a drunken disaster. Don't say no to doing the same thing every year. No matter how successful your last office Christmas party was, a certain percentage of people will get bored if you do it again. Try to think of your side as an event rather than a get-together. Instead of a traditional sit-around-somewhere-and-eat party, you can host disc golf, skating, curling or bowling parties. If you live somewhere with a warm enough climate, a river or bay cruise could be unforgettable. Or turn your party into a Christmas murder or treasure hunt. Just find something anyone can do, and don't do the same thing twice. If you change the guest list from inviting employees only to inviting employees and their families to a company party, people's expectations, and behavior change, too. First of all, alcohol consumption will decrease. And as a bonus, more people will probably attend when they don't find a babysitter. Activity-based parties are especially good for this – people of all ages can skate or play a bowl. Instead of hosting an employee-only corporate Christmas party, expand your guest list to include extended family, friends, neighbors, and business partners. Mixing up your guests makes your party more interesting for participants because you will have a chance to meet new people and have less chance of being trapped in an endless shop talking. One example is to hold an open day with a goal such as lifting and decorating a tree. Then there's the alcohol dilemma. Should you serve at your Christmas party? As a human being, you want all your guests to have a good time and be safe. But happiness and safety can be compromised when people drink. And as a social host, legally you have an obligation to supervise your guests and make sure you all get home safely if you are consuming alcohol at your party. There is no rule that you have to serve alcohol at your office Christmas party. If it makes you uncomfortable or anxious, don't give it up. People can certainly have a good time without drinking alcohol. Just make sure everyone knows it's an alcohol-free party up front and that you have a lot of other things if people are thirsty. In addition to juices, teas, coffees and alcohol-free punches, mocktails can be a fun alternative. If you decide to serve alcohol on your part, make sure you understand your responsibility and plan for a safe party. The trick to successfully hosting any party is to mix just the right amount of excitement and comfort. With these ideas company Christmas party, you can host a party that employees are looking forward to attending instead of come up with excuses for avoiding. Your home address can be highlighted as a concert venue and you can create a tear-off section on the invitation side for a free piece of cake or a bag of confectionery. For a little more fun, mix up some invisible ink or squeeze a bowl full of lemon juice. Ask the birthday boy or girl to carefully dip the fine brush into the juice and write an invisible invitation.
